

giving our commenters some credit (or, taking a minute on this long trek to look at the great view...)

Posted by Prof. Goose on June 4, 2005 - 8:24pm

I have to say, having spent some time in the blogosphere (perhaps too much), that I think our commenters are some of the best in the business. Our comment boxes have really intriguing discussions of topics, some turn into linkfests of their own...but they are always of high quality. After seeing some of the drivel and pabulum that's in the comment boxes on other sites, for some reason the quality here always surprises and heartens me.

One of the goals HO and I have for this blog is to build a community that builds on itself with knowledge and purpose with regard to this ridiculously complex and salient topic. I would like to think we're moving toward that goal.

It is very gratifying to see the topics get discussed at such a high level, celebrating the exchange different ideas. It is also gratifying to see how many people have been coming to visit our site each day as well.

So, thank you, thank you, thank you...this whole thing really would run quite poorly without your educated participation.

Also, remember, if you are a frequent commenter and you'd like to post something here, please by all means, write it up and run it past us at the address in the sidebar. It worked well for Ianqui's post, so we'll keep the option open. (Submission doesn't guarantee publication of course...but we'll at least read it!)

Go to the postings for today

Technorati Tags: peak oil, oil

This work is licensed under a Creative Commons Attribution-Share Alike 3.0 United States License.