Robert Rapier recently was in the position of having to lay off several employees when the employer Robert worked for closed the office all of them worked for. Robert had a job lined up for himself, but he found it difficult to find jobs for the several well-qualified people that he had to lay off. These workers were in energy-related fields.

I am sure that around the nation and world, there are a lot of other laid-off workers in energy related fields looking for jobs. My question today is--who is hiring? Are there any employers you know of who are currently adding workers? If you have some knowledge to share, perhaps it will help someone looking for a job. It may also give us a little insight as to how the recession is affecting different parts of the economy.
