

So, er, what's your plan?

Posted by Prof. Goose on May 3, 2005 - 8:13pm

From the comments a couple of posts back:

J says:

Laying aside the nominative squabbling about what kind of government we are slinking towards, I guess I have one burning question for every one of the people reading this blog - what are any of you doing (personally and/or professionally) to prepare for the next decade? Does anybody here actually have a personal plan or is everybody waiting on government for the solution?

Big Gav responds:

I have a personal plan of the "head for the hills" variety - which is partly based on identifying "what sort of place is likely to slide down the peak in the most comfortable way", "what skills do I need to gain to become a valuable member of that community" and "how do I insert myself into such a place (which is partly a money and timing problem)".

This comment thread really got me to thinking.

So, why not open up another commenting thread just to ask you this question:

What's your plan (let's say in the next year) with regard to the oil situation? Do you have one? Are you formulating one? Are you thinking government will take care of the situation? How are you changing your life?

(Also, don't be a threadkiller and take up 25 inches of column space...this is meant to be a conversational thread. Thank you!)

Technorati Tags: peak oil, oil

This work is licensed under a Creative Commons Attribution-Share Alike 3.0 United States License.